What Snowmen Do at Night

By the light of the full moon, snowmen appeared at the zoo, out of nowhere.

Perhaps as the lions say, they were made by the monkeys.

Banana peels were found littered around them and they had tails.

When the next morning came, they were not where they first were. They were sighted in the penguin enclosure, sporting flippers.

There was a general commotion heard nearby, at the sea lion pond. Lots of barks and claps were heard. But no animals could see a thing and the sea lions the next morning weren't talking. Visitors noticed some snowmen by the pond with tails, flippers, and giant whiskers.

Night came once again to the zoo. There was a cold, foggy haze seen by the Tiger pen. Growls and howls and hoots were heard that night. In the morning snowmen were observed in the Lion's tree, covered in sporty stripes, along with their tails, flippers and giant whiskers. The lions had quite a grin. Not one would say a word.

By now animals and innkeepers alike could not wait for night to arrive. It appeared they had a mystery on their hands, and they couldn't wait to find out about these mysterious snowmen

It began at the rhinoceros run. Snorts and hoof sounds could be heard throughout the zoo, but nothing out of the ordinary could be seen.

Night came again and this time all the zoo animals were on the alert.

The next night was a new moon. The snowmen were nowhere to be found.
